WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

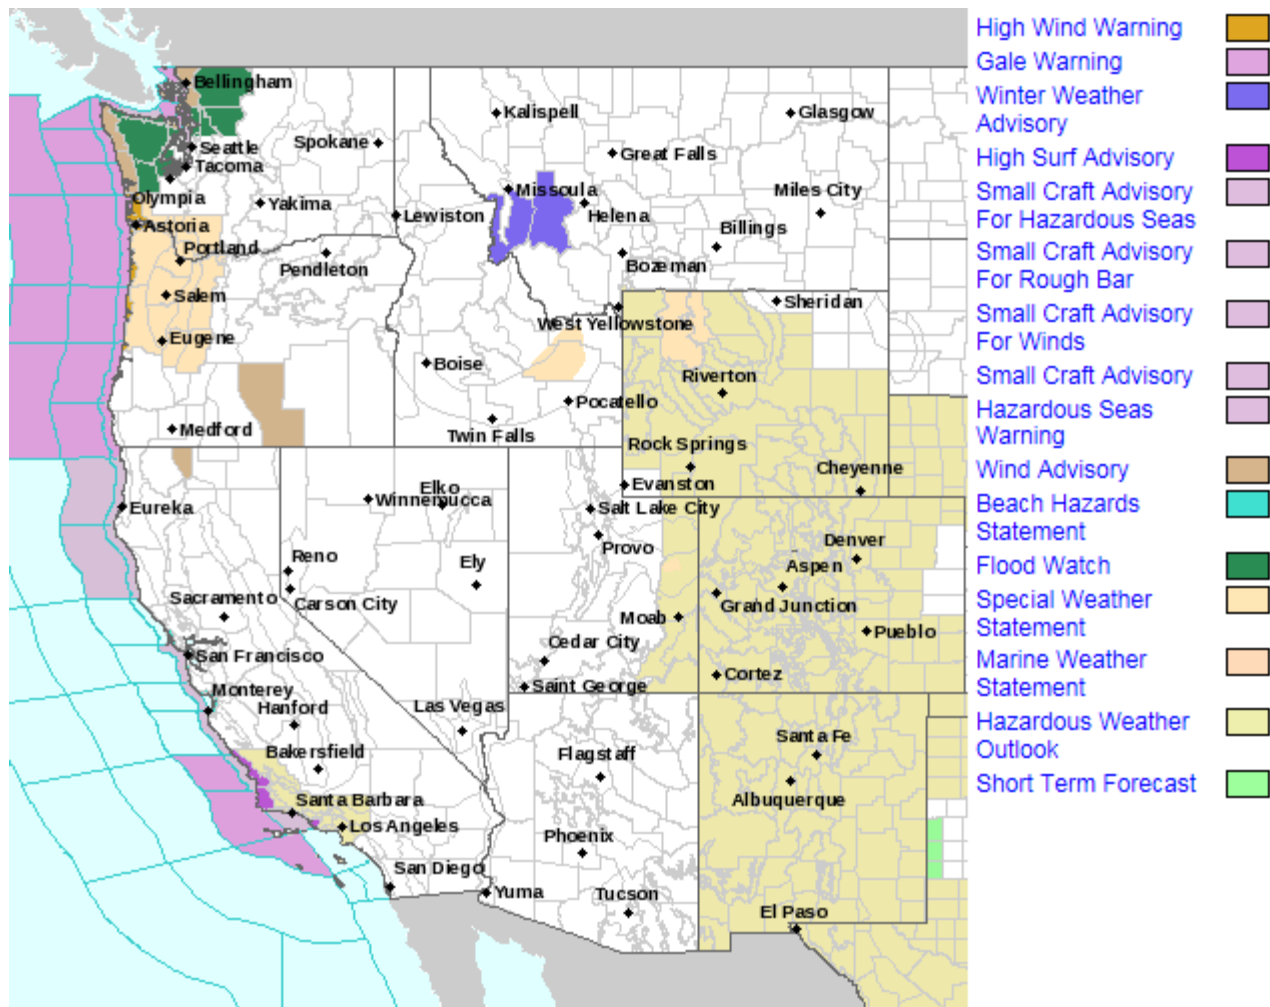

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA:

A series of weather systems will keep moving through Northern California into early next week and likely beyond to keep the weather pattern unsettled for some time. There will be lingering cloudiness and showers in the north today and the next well defined weather system will move ashore Wednesday and move inland overnight. There will be bit of a break between systems Thursday before another arrives Friday. Precipitation is expected in all areas by the weekend. Friday looks especially wet for the western areas in particular. The further south and east areas of Northern California will see the least amounts of rain, so there will be quite the storm-total-precipitation-amount gradient across the Geographic Area by Saturday afternoon. Many inches of rain (3-5, locally several more) are likely in the northwest by then, with a half inch or perhaps less expected around Tahoe. Moderate to strong, gusty southerly winds will occur with many of these systems with ridge tops gusting into the 40-55 mph range during the periods of strongest winds. Snow levels will drop to a range of 5000-6000 feet with some accumulations at the higher elevations. Drier weather appears likely Sunday and Monday before another weather system arrives later Monday and next Tuesday.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA:

Locally windy conditions will follow the passage of a weak trough over the next couple of days. Expect north and northwest winds of 20-30 mph with gusts to 45 mph to continue through the day across the Kern County Mountains, the I-5 Corridor and the Antelope Valley. In addition, north winds of 15-25 mph will be possible across the central coast and the south coast of Santa Barbara County. The winds will decrease during the day Wednesday as high pressure builds over the region. A warming trend will occur through the middle of the week, and by Thursday, expect valley high temperatures to reach the upper 80s with 70s common in the mountains below 6,000 feet. Friday into the weekend, a low pressure system is expected to race into Northern California. This system will bring widespread rain to the north half of the state Friday night and Saturday. Most of the precipitation will fall north of the region, but rainfall may occur as far south as Fresno and San Luis Obispo County. At this time, rainfall amounts look to be over a half inch across northern Monterey County and in the Sierras from Yosemite northward. Elsewhere, expect much cooler weather with very windy weather in and near the deserts over the weekend. Temperatures will be well below normal over most areas Saturday and Sunday. Next week, high pressure over the Great Basin may bring light offshore winds and much warmer weather next Tuesday or Wednesday.
